A thoughtful business woman must be both amused and vexed upon resid-ing such utterances as those with which a distinguished English social como-mist begins a profound chapter head-ed: "The Problem of Woman." Only during the past five years, I be lieve, have women become the heads of firms and the owners of trading establishments—that is, to any great ex-tent. And their appearance in this new role has brought up in another form the problem that presented itself when young girls first entered counting rooms.

I was declared that the girls were driving out the boys. A deft young miss quick at figures, next and active, was content with much less salary than a men and in many respects she proved far more compelent. Thus it has come about that many a clever youth can find nothing to do, while his sides, readily procure elections. while his sisters readily procure clerileal situations. The result is no end of arguments to prove that the girls should stay at home and give the boys a chapter. Now, as I said, the business woman finds that many of the qualities peculiar to her sex give her an advantage against which male competitors have no way of contending. An agreeable, obliging, refined lady can secure more patrons than any dull, promise, matter-of-fact man.

Well, along comes a social economist. "This will never do," says he, "for the men have wives and children to support, and woman's sphere is at ical situations. The result is no end

And she will lift up others, too. For when a woman succeeds in business does she not give employment to others, just like a man? But there is this difference: The woman is ten-der and sympathetic. She is enpable of interesting herself in the peo-ple who earn their bread by toiling for her. She can see what is to their good far better than any man. The odd quality of character which makes a man one being in his office and another creature entirely outside of it is no part of a woman's nature. For a woman is always a woman. She takes pleasure in the happiness of others and she does not define business by saying it is business. If yes, may they not live well, provided they do so in a and improve whatever they come in proper way? And if business affords men the means of living no one should forbid them to employ that means without providing a substitute equally good. Marriage is not to be considered in this connection for very obvious reasons. So, as I stated in the beginning, there is nothing left but to quarrel with the social system. It is absurd to find fault with the women; when an innocent man charged with

If I were obliged to decide wherein woman's influence in My very first business experiences convinced me that women can teach men lots of things about barter and sale. We all know that the gentler sex is pronounced gossipy about trifles. Many business men would compel wemen to look to their laurels in this respect. In fact I think women generally have a far better notion of the value of time than men. In the numerous little emergencies that arise, I find men curiously incapable of acting quickly. They want time to think when a woman would do the right
